“The Other e-Learning: The Empathy Gap and its Relationship to the Equity Gap.”

Dr. Hogan invites participants to explore the relationship between equity gaps in higher education and empathy gaps in our culture more broadly.

In recent years, empathy has emerged as an important topic of study. Brain research has revolutionized and legitimized the scientific study of how we feel. In higher education we have become acclimated to the affective revolution, from Paul Tough’s drawing upon attachment theory to help us understand grit to Brene Brown’s assertion that empathy is the antidote to shame, and thus the great enabler of learning and innovation.

It is clear that empathy is a critical discipline, a Habit of Mind, and without empathy there can be no equity. But how do you DO empathy? Dr. Hogan will propose that the answer is simpler than we think, and perfectly within our reach as California community college educators. She will introduce examples where sustained, text-based conversations supported by the Reading Apprenticeship framework have enabled the equitable learning conditions we aspire to.
